SIX RULES FOR BUSINESS SUCCESS BY CHARLES MARCUS

I have had the unique opportunity over the years to work with and/or study some of the smartest and most successful business people spanning many industries. I have been able to apply and practice this learning in my own business and sales success. Based on this experience I have deduced that these six rules, or powerful P's, are truly the building blocks for success. Yes, they may be articulated differently, however, it is these same six things I have seen used by very successful companies, both small and large. They work equally as well for an entrepreneur just getting started or the sales professional, as the large corporation that wants to take their business to the next level. If you follow them, and that is the operative word, follow them.....you will not go to far wrong.

1. PURPOSE:

What ever you do, you have to have a strong enough reason for wanting to do it. Do you have the staying power to succeed? Do you have an end in mind? Without knowing what you want and why you want to do it, you will be doomed to failure before you start. So sit down, ask yourself what your vision and true purpose is. It does not matter what your reasons are; they can be monetary, moral, materialistic, or maybe an opportunity to give back, to make a difference. Ask yourself: does that purpose have your full and unwavering commitment at all times?

Copyright © 2003: Charles M. Marcus

2. PASSION:

We need passion to sustain us. Purpose gets us going, but passion is the lightning rod of success. It is contagious. When people see how enthusiastic you are, how determined you are, how serious your belief is, you will stand head and shoulders above your competition; in fact, there is no competition for a truly passionate person. Passion comes from deep; it comes from within, from the heart and soul. It will keep you going when those tough times come, when that inevitable slump appears, when the going gets rough. Have you ever doubted, when you see a truly passionate person, that they will succeed. Truly passionate people have that twinkle in their eye and incredible resilience. Look at Tony Robbins, the famous motivational guru, or Magic Johnson, the ex superstar NBA basketball player, now a successful business entrepreneur, or Bono of U2, of the famous Irish pop group, and now also a world poverty campaigner. They all share passion and belief as a common characteristic. When you hear them on the television, read about them, or are lucky enough to be around them, it rubs off. You feel better about yourself, and when you feel good about yourself, other people feel good and have more confidence in you.

www.cmarcus.com

Look at the people around you who evoke passion, who you admire. Learn from them. You don't have to be famous to evoke passion. Just believe in yourself and in what you are doing.

3. PLANNING:

Once you have the reason for doing what you are doing, and the passion and belief in it, you need a plan of action. Do you have a game plan? Whether it is a business plan, personal goal setting plan, financial plan or whatever, you need an approach to get from A to B. What tools or skills do you need? What is your plan of action? How are you going to achieve your goals and objectives? I have found personally that without a sound plan and goals, I have rarely succeeded. It is worth enlisting the services of an expert if you are starting a business to help set up your business plan. If you are a sales professional, set goals that will challenge you, but ones that are realistic and flexible also. We do not plan to fail, but we sometimes fail to plan. Listen to the wise words of Jim Rohn: " I find it fascinating that people plan their vacation with better care than they plan there lives. Perhaps that is because escape is easier than change"

4. POSITIONING:

What is your unique positioning statement? What differentiates you from your competition? This is one of the greatest challenges for most people whatever business or venture they are in. It varies depending on what you are trying to sell, what product or service you offer. Remember, though, that it is not about you, it is about what you can offer the client, customer, consumer and prospect. When I sold hair products for Continued on next page... NEXXUS Products Company, headquartered in Santa Barbara, U.S.A., our positioning statement was that we had "a specialty line of hair care products that would cater to all of your customers needs". It was a full service diversified line. and at that time (the early 1990's) we were unique in what was a very crowded marketplace. We also offered an unconditional return policy, which in itself was not unique; most, but not all, of our competition did too. But what made us stand out was that we did not just offer this guarantee for 30, 60, 90 days etc, but we offered it for the lifetime that product was on the salon owners shelf. If the salon owner did not sell that product, we took it back from them at any time. If they sold the product and the customer brought it back to the salon for whatever reason, even if the product was nearly empty and had obviously been used, we took it back and credited the customer in full. no questions asked, even one or two years later. Do you think our policies stood out and got our customers and prospects attention? You bet they did! Nobody could touch us. We took the worry, risk and hassle away from our customer.

Ask yourself what separates you from your competitors. What is your positioning statement? What guarantees are you offering? What is your uniqueness in the crowded marketplace?

5. PROMOTION:

Now that you have positioned yourself in the marketplace, you have to be able to promote what it is you sell or offer.

Copyright © 2003: Charles M. Marcus

I have always found that the best way to promote yourself is through referrals. Do a GOOD job for your present client or customer and then ask them for their help. They will gladly introduce you to your future customers or clients. People like to help other people, when they are asked in a nice respectful way. Ask if they know anybody in their network or circle who would benefit from what it is you offer. Explain that you build your business that way and you would be very grateful and appreciative for their help.

Another way to promote yourself is to form strategic alliances with other businesses that sell different things than you. As an example, when I owned my hairdressing salons, I formed an alliance with the other retail outlets on the street where my business was, obviously not another hairdressers. We referred our customers to each other, and it worked great, everybody won except maybe my competition, the other hairdressing salons on my street!.

Many people spend all their time prospecting and cold calling, when there is more business already available right in front of you, as long as you ask for it. There are many imaginative ways that I will write about in more detail in another edition of the newsletter on promotion..

www.cmarcus.com

6. PERSISTENCE:

Success, someone once said, is 90% failure. I would not completely disagree with that statement. I believe that to succeed we have to be prepared to fail over and over again. Persistence means getting over the rejection of losing that sale or order or new contract, and not taking it personally. I have had plenty of personal experience with this one, and can attest to the fact that successful people do not take rejection personally.

Persistence is being diligent in following up with people and returning phone calls promptly. Persistence is being resilient and believing in yourself and what product or service you provide to people. To be successful in business you must be persistent, but not a pest, with your present customers and clients and with your prospects. This is a fine line that experience teaches you and your customer/client will definitely relay to you.

Persistence is not rocket science, we all know what we have to do, but it is the successful business person, entrepreneur, sales professional etc, who takes this one truly to heart and does not give up.

Charles Marcus is a professional speaker presenting keynote speeches and workshops internationally. Telephone Charles at 416-490-6744 or visit his website at www.cmarcus.com

Copyright 2003-Charles M. Marcus.